PREPARED FOR A STORM.—The Montpelier (VI.) Jegus relates that a recently married man in that place went home rather late the other night, after having imbulsed a little too much champagne, and, expecting of course his considition would arouse the indignation of his spease, proceeded to his room with an imbrella, which he took from the rack in the hall. He speedly undressed, his wife not saving a word, and quietly he slipped into hed. At this moment the growed wife ventured to remark, "You smell of rom, John!" Instantly he rose up, besting his unbording the umbrella over him. The wife with astonishment exclaimed, would rather the law would print them.
